

A HAWKEYE NEWS FLASH

NEW BRUNSWICK ... DESPERATELY SEEKING STUDENTS

CTV Atlantic aired this story on Wednesday's news (Feb. 7/'07) that is very much indicative of voter's frustration in that province.

Interest in elections and the current political system is on the wane in New Brunswick, just as in this and, other provinces across Canada.

So much so that in New Brunswick, the "government" there is seriously thinking of making election day a school holiday. Again, a different slant on an act of desperation as party memberships fall and voters stay home.

The idea behind this, these dummies figure, is that young people in school will , in later years, make the association in their minds that elections are a good thing ... because they used to get holidays. The hope is that this association will extend into having the kids work in elections , join parties and, eventually be enthusiastic supporters of a system that will lie to them, pick their pockets clean, and continue to support the elite who benefit the most from this form of governmental system.

Get 'em brainwashed while they're young, and, maybe, they won't be as disillusioned with government and political parties as their parents and grandparents are, today.

Hey kids, remember, "Never smile at a crocodile."
