

Fingilas

Fingilas lived in Nargothrond with her father Orodreth. She was betrothed to Guindor and was very beautiful, a high princess of the Noldor.

Her betrothed was captured by Morgoth, but he returned at last with a companion who called himself Agarwaen son of Umarch.

Unknown to Fingilas this was actually Túrin son of Húrin.

Despite her old feelings for Guindor, Fingilas fell in love with Túrin, but Túrin refused her in respect for his friend. Guindor realized this, and revealed Túrin's name to Fingilas, and tried to persuade Túrin to submit to his feelings for Fingilas, realising that Fingilas stood between Túrin and the curse of Morgoth.

Fingilas was eventually impaled by orcs with a spear against a tree. With her dying breath, she begged the Men of Brethil to tell Túrin where she had fallen.

When Túrin finally tracked her to Brethil and learned of her death, he swooned almost lifeless upon her burial mound.

He eventually declared that Guindor had spoken truth and that Fingilas still stood between him and his doom.
