Secrecy as Power

Risk Taking and Expertise

There is much consideration within silence and noise, flesh and rumor, desires and need, praying and deeds; a powerful point of secrecy. It is the foundation of the family, the integrity of the being and that which separates the spirit from the host – a to some extent accurate contention of realizations. Derivative of the term secrenere to sever or separate, this belief that secret knowledge is power is often set against the idea that information is power - and is an ingredient of the precincts placed on learning, training, meaning, association, endeavor and experience. However, this distinction between the two concepts is not entirely applicable. Rather, it is the developed philosophy or schools of thought that practice either, which limit the governmental anatomy down to its intestinal category of 'taboo', and in a sense of intellectual growth, converts the idea of secrecy, into a portentous value. Even though in many respects this wild hedge prevaricator, may connect the civilized with the savage and

The maxim, "Everyone wants to go to heaven, but no one wants to die", is grim commentary on the opposing nature of the probable cost of achieving the utility that our means have set. Having fixed ourselves to this linear reality, it is possible to ascertain the spiral proceeding activity; such as dialogue, commonality and technocracy in political control. This theorem is relevant in understanding what is needed in ability and detail for the guidance of a polity or social order during a period of analysis – to be precise, the issue of expertise.

For in which it is impossible to answer all questions, it is also quite impossible to deny or ignore in totality. Thus in reason, the patterns and trends of success are context forms - and in focus, that is all that is necessary in the identification of root causes and the creative and problem solving visioning of the bazaar of ideas. Therefore, in judging notions of freedoms and self-sufficiency, the meta-phorical distinctions must be made between a village and a collection of chalet cottages, between a village community and a fellowship resort. The context of one is a place of residence and work, while the other - a place of impermanence and repose. So too in distinguishing the excellence of sacred art of historical significance and that of accessible works of commercial value. This difference in approach is only symbolic, in that it alludes to activities that are the outcome of roads taken, even if not lending reliance to the construction of an essence of domestic characterization. This is conformant to the notion of direction beyond the claim of random placement (even in the democratic process) and regards it instead and always as the positioning of an expert nonetheless.

the public with the private. Nevertheless, while secrecy as power is believed to be hidden in common by-ways, out of reach of the more selective, it is also considered an exclusive place of the extraordinary, eccentric or oddity. This may be reason for the imagery of the secret laboratory found in the concept of separation, a metallurgical and chemical process by which minerals are separated from a mass state. Yet still, secrecy as power differs from discovery, since it is not an unknown, like the scientist's 'grey' area in which an added drop of probability exposes an ambiguous truth. Instead, the set idea of secrecy as power is an essential fact concealed. Therefore in the analysis of both these concepts, the social instruct in use of these elements is most pertinent.

For example, a failure to administer remedy is not secret as power, since remedy does not depend on secret as a mechanism. On the contrary, secrecy as power is a procedural dependence, since it relies on a revelation of sorts in order to transmit meaning. An analogy of this would be an ancient statue sculpted naked, with a back as its front, yet with an incomplete front. In this example reason would have it, that there must be a front, thus most viewers would go around the statue. Historically, propo-proponents of secret knowledge have been defended by arguments of political and integral defense, as well as its opponents by a press for freedom and safety. An example of this is CNN's coverage of the first US/Iraq war in which a journalist's sourcing created a live interpretive window in what was at that time (war commentary) considered a political 'taboo', usually reserved for post conflict interpretation. Therefore even though information as power appeared to triumph, it was really the idea of secrecy as power that prevailed in the possibility of live interaction with an adversary. This example is given strictly in the conflict between military and media interests. The idea that information is power is product of both corrective invention and structural advancement. Historically, these two ideas have been perceived differently, in the wisdom that the ancient Chinese deemed corrective invention as an en-walled necessity, outside of which all else are uncivilized; versus many other Empires that eventually perceived expansion and exploration as an indication of civility. It is from this empirical stand point that the concepts of information and and secrecy as power can best be exemplified, and as point of accuracy, it is worthy to note that these historical approaches contradict theories of ancient Chinese globalization as well as European novelty - save but theoretical Pangeanism. Currently, there are many polities in which information is ignored, abandoned, destroyed and overlooked, as well as often exists a voluminous fatigue which often sedates interest towards information, replaced by a conflict of urgency in acquisi-tion, often compromising the durational balance between critical reasoning and discipline. Therefore the distinctions between the two concepts is that secrecy as power connotes two ideas; that of associational restriction and the acquisition of secret knowledge, while information as power is suggestive of awakening and possible omnipotence, the idea that things improve with knowledge.
