

What comake or this? Just another poor sucker, caught in the cruel vice grip of life. One can say that, yes. It might help one make sense of it all to say that it was just one more instance of another sap who wigged when he couldn't take the pressure. I don't think it'll help one sleep better at night. For better or worse, Ferri and others like him are pointing the way that the country is headed. There are a lot of people like them: in fact, it could be you or me in just a few years.

This is not a defense of what Mr. Ferri achieved; it does however, bring up a question of Karma. Why did he choose Pettit as the place for his "last stand"? Could he have possibly held a grudge for 10 long years? And there were other places and people on the 'hit list'; why did he choose the firm? My own feelings is that Pettit represented the point in his life where things began to unravel. I also firmly believe that it's also a case, for Pettit, of the chickens coming home to roost. They were extremely lucky that more people were not killed. If he had gone one or two more floors up, more people would be dead.

There's no overriding moral to this story. The end you knew already; the beginning I hope I clarified just a small bit. I think the only "responsible" way to end this tale is with a small warning:
