

On the statistical foundations of natural philosophy

Policy of God

Saurav Dwivedi

10 May 2005

God governs quite natural things by his policy that is regarded as statistics. Under God's policy any object has indifferent orientations. God does not manage things to occur at different orientations at an instant. God plays statistics to make stability. In stable atoms some electrons enjoyed at excited state facing and interacting with outer circumstances while others at ground state enjoyed their worthlessness with a satisfaction. God provides exact psychological positions and responsibilities by critically observing intellectual interest of matter being. I enjoy my psychological position philosophizing quite natural laws with appreciating highest spiritual values while other boys are still worthless toys of nature. We are aware which nuts and bolts God uses in his policy. God remains calm in illustrating natural laws while charging us to appreciate them. Perhaps God has nothing to do with our demonstrations. Under his policy, he suggests things to occur at this and that position as critically based on its intellectual interests. A physicist enjoys his highest psychological positions while others enjoy their lower positions having satisfied themselves with their philosophical needs. God does not observe our work while awarding. He only determines our great will and critical appreciation. God loves independentness. It despite thing's highest position. If a creature remains at lower positions, it provides God a psychological pain that my creation could not achieve this and that height in the field provided to him. God enjoys the highest and independent people who sacrifice their achievements to praise others. If we could only understand God's policy without questioning him.