Another theory holds that the Hanseatic League was the origin of its definition, manufacture, and name: the German name for the Baltic is Ostsee ('East Sea') and from this the Baltic merchants were called Osterlings ('Easterlings').^[10] In 1260, Henry III granted them a charter of protection and land for their kontor, the Steelyard of London, which by the 1340s was also called Esterlingeshalle ('Easterlings Hall').^[11] Because the League's money was not frequently debased like that of England, English traders stipulated to be paid in pounds of the "Easterlings", which was contracted to "sterling".^[12] The OED dismisses this theory as unlikely, since the stressed first syllable would not have been elided.^[9]

Encyclopædia Britannica states that the (pre-Norman) Anglo-Saxon kingdoms had silver coins called sterlings and that the compound noun pound sterling was derived from a pound (weight) of these sterlings.^[13]

The English word pound derives from the Latin expression libra pondō, in which libra is a noun meaning 'pound' and pondō is a noun, in the ablative case, meaning 'by weight'.^[14]^[15]
